young burglar in The Bronx attempted to escape from his captors yesterday morning by jumping window of a moving elevated milroad train. The detectives who were with him caught him by the feet and legs and held him, suspended head down, until the train was stopped, a block further on. Then they dragged him back through the window. The boy's scalp was cut and he was a little bruised, but otherwise was uninjured.

William O'Brien is the youth who took the rather desperate chance. He is 18 years old, and has worked as a plumber. For the last five months he has been living in a furnished room at 2132 Wash-The Bronx. The boy gave people in the house the impression that he was a youth of some means who did not have to worry about money mat-He was pleasant and affable and dressed nattily. He made no intiin the house, but his neighbors mew him slightly and liked him.

the floor below the flat in which O'Brien had a room lives John Cummins and his wife and child. At about 1:30 resterday morning Cummins was awakened by a slight sound in the room occupied by his wife and the child, and went to the door. Hearing footsteps of a person wearing shoes he lighted a and went into the room. In the re of the match he saw a man who he says was O'Brien fumbling about the dresser. He recognized the boy at once, he says, and feeling sure that the intruder d at his work, would have no thought but for his own escape, ran into the hallway and called up the Bronx Detective Bureau. When he returned to the bedroom the boy had gone and it was only then that Mrs. Commins was

The call to the detective bureau was transferred to the Bathgate avenue police station, and it chanced that Detectives Schueing and Sullivan of the bureau were at the station house when the telephone rang. They had just brought drunken fall, and at the momen ambulance surgeon was fixing up his head while the ambulance waited in the street outside. The burglar call tectives took a look about O'Brien's room. In a bureau drawer they found a jimmy and a lot of skeleton keys. Then they told the boy to dress and go along with them. A further search, made while the boy got into his clothes, turned up a woman's gold watch and some pieces of silverware which the average unmarried young man does not use in furnished lodgings. The value of the stuff found was about $200. There were also a number of pawnstickets, and in a pocket of

O'Brien then became indignant and sullen. When he was dressed the detectives walked him over to the Wendover avenue station of the Third avenue elevated railroad and boarded a train for the Bronx detective bureau. The detectives and their prisoner found cross seats in the last car. O'Brien was next the window, with one detective at his side and the other facing him.

As the train started from the station As the train started from the station, the prisoner sat motionless, but an instant later the last car passed the end of the platform and G'Brien jumped up and dived through the open window. His head struck the wooden rail marking the limit of the station and it was then that he is the control of the station and it was then that he head struck the wooden rail marking the limit of the station and it was then that he received his most serious injury.

When the detectives realized what was happening they grabbed for their prisoner but got their hands on him only after his body was entirely through the window. Two pairs of hands caught his feet and an effort was made to bull him back. His head was close to the track and his hair was brushing the ties as the train rushed along.

The moment the detectives were sure of their hold on their man Sullivan handed over the foot he held to Schetting and reached up and pulled the bell cord. The motorman stopped with such a jerk that many passengers jumped from their seats. When the train stopped the detectives pulled the boy back into the car the same way he had tried to leave. Then they handcuffed him and led him back the block or so along the narrow path by the side of the track to the station they had just left.

O'Brien's head was bleeding, and he presently became faint. His captors sent in a call for an ambulance, and O'Brien was taken to the Lebanon Hospital, as it was thought he had a fractured skull. At the hospital, however, he soon revived and after his hurts had been dressed he was found to be in good shape. Later he was arraigned in the Morrisania court and Magistrate Corrigan held him in $1,500 bail for examination Monday morning. He was charged with burglary on the complaint of Mr. Cummins. He was taken down to Mulberry street headquarters.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Aug. 14.-Robbers visited the First National Bank of Hopin the street outside. The burglar call was so urgent that the two detectives ran out of the station house and jumped into the ambulance, telling the driver to hustle to the Westchester avenue address.

When the ambulance got there Cummins was at the door. The burglar, he said, had escaped through a rear door in the apartments, which apparently he had left open as a means of retreat. Cummins also told them who the boy was and that he lived upstairs. So upstairs the detectives went.

O'Brien was undressed and in bed and answered the knocking at his door very sleepily. He let the detectives in, but talked incoherently, half from feigned drowsiness and half from makebelieve intoxication. Cummins, however, was positive in his identification, so the detectives took a look about O'Brien's room. In a bureau drawer they found a jimmy and a let of skeleton kaye. Then there
